Privilege of the Bottom Bunk

Taylor Johnatakis (29838509)

All,

This week brought a big change to my 'bid' here in prison. I have had a few big changes while I have been here. As inmates we call our time here a 'bid' (always seem to have these commercial terms that pop up). I have a 7-year 3 month 'Bid'...and I have been 'down' 9 months. Since I have been here in Springfield, the big changes have been moving from the 20-man dorm style room on a top bunk, to being invited to a 4-man room/cell to another top bunk. A 4-man room is way better than a 20-man dorm (even worse my bunk was in the middle of the room). Then another big change was when I started working in the Woodshop as a Carpenter, which was really fun. It makes the days long, because we actually work all day, but it makes the weeks go by really fast.

Well, I had another big change happen, I got a bottom bunk! I have been in the 4-man room for a while, and one of the original roommates in one of the two bottom bunks was transferred to a Prison Camp somewhere, so by seniority, I was able to move to the bottom bunk! Yay. Bottom bunks are way better than top bunks. I can sit on the bunk, I can get in and out of it with ease, especially if you need to use the bathroom in the middle of the night. It is just so nice...When you are on the bottom bunk, it's like the bunk is yours, the guy on the top bunk is just a guest. In prison it is all the little things that matter, it's the smallest of things that make time easier to do. Having a full commissary budget (which by the way, if anyone wants to help with commissary funds it's much appreciated) to be able to have enough money for deodorant, toothpaste, and food to fill in for small portion sizes the prison gives makes you feel like you have some control. Having good roommates makes you feel safe when you close your eyes. Having a good job makes the time pass and give some purpose to your time. Getting mail, pictures and emails makes you feel not forgotten. In prison it's the littlest things that can make the moment a little easier. Universally I have found inmates are much more appreciative of the little things. We do not take things for granted, because IT CAN ALWAYS GET WORSE. Just being able to go outside for rec some days will settle you out after the outside has been closed randomly for a few days.

Recently we lost TV privileges in the housing unit for a week because of some trash that was found outside in the grass (mainly inmates feeding the squirrels, skunks and possums that frequent the grassy area outside the windows at night). After the week of no TVs, when they came back, everybody was SOOO grateful to just watch SportsCenter again. On the outside, you take those things for granted, in here, everything beyond breathing is a privilege.

I have found there is a very clear distinction between rights and privileges in prison. You have very, very few rights, everything on the outside you consider a right, in here is a privilege (including my privilege to send this email at my own expense, which by the way, I pay $.05 a minute to write it).

Well, I am excited for my privilege of having a bottom bunk, I am very grateful for it.

Tonight, when you are in the bed of your choosing, likely waking up next to someone you love...Just remember, I am sleeping on a bunk bed, and across the room is a man who at one time had a life-time sentence for attempted murder...

Love you all,
Taylor

William Watson Time Well Spent

Anyone who has followed William Watson's story or the Gateway Pundit as they cover J6ers, and their lives should know his name and his face (it was everywhere following January 6th) not everyone knows what he did while serving double his sentencing guidelines.

J6 Political Prisoner Will Watson is Finally Home and With the Daughter He Had Never Held | The Gateway Pundit | by Guest Contributor

Guest Post by Jenn Baker Stepping out of prison, after being politically persecuted and held hostage by your government, should be the best feeling in the world.

While he was serving time in solitary confinement in Alexandria he renewed his relationship with God according to the article. He also worked on his dreams of owning a food truck and working toward opening a fine dining restaurant shortly after that. Dreams that those who know him have little doubt he will achieve, but the American people can give him a hand in getting there faster.

He was just released from prison and needs help obtaining a place to live and getting back on his feet. This is more difficult for January 6th defendants as many of them have difficulty being approved for housing due to their charges and lack of recent work history.

This challenge is all the more important for William Watson to overcome as his daughter was born prematurely while he was incarcerated. He held her for the first time upon release (as can be seen in the article) as she had medical complexities that prevented her from being able to visit her father while incarcerated.

Please help the Watson family if you are able to do so.

Curtis Tate A Journey

This past week Curtis Tate appeared both in the Gateway Pundit and on the We Are Good Men podcast. In the article Curtis shares a message of encouragement to his fellow J6ers that all the country, if we take the time to read it, could benefit from. On the podcast, if one chooses to listen, you can hear Curtis, in his own words, tell of his childhood, his journey through addiction, going to nursing school, and how he did not support Trump at first. The podcast continues with Curtis talking about how he came to care about politics and his journey to becoming a Trump supporter.

Curtis Tate attended the January 6, 2021 protests in Washington DC.

Curtis is one of the numerous men who were present on the West Terrace on January 6th and witnessed the death of Rosanne Boyland at the hands of officers. He speaks of attempting to assist her with lifesaving aide, but he was unable to due to police interfering in that process. This is important to know as it was brought before Congress yesterday in a hearing on capitol hill where testimony again put her name on the record.
